CELEBRATING 5 YEARS OF STATES BANNING LIFE WITHOUT PAROLE FOR CHILDREN

A MESSAGE OF HOPE

The Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth (CFSY) was launched in 2009 to coordinate, bolster, and build new strategies to end the United States' practice of sentencing children to life in prison without parole—the most punitive sentence imposed on our children. It is a sentence to die in prison, imposed only in the United States.

Sentencing children to die in prison declares them irredeemable, defining their lives based on their worst mistakes. All children—even those convicted of the most serious crimes—are capable of change and deserving of a second chance at life. In addition, children who receive the harshest treatment are frequently the most vulnerable children in our society: children from poor communities, children of color, and children who have endured extensive trauma.

Our vision is to help create a society that respects the dignity and human rights of children through a justice system that operates with consideration of the child's age, provides youth with opportunities to return to the community, and bars the imposition of life without parole for children under age 18. This vision is turning into reality as states change their policies and individuals previously sentenced to life without parole as children begin to return home, as productive members of society.

Over the course of seven years, the Campaign's vision of states ending life without parole sentences for children went from an improbable ask to common practice.

In 2011, only five states did not permit children to be sentenced to life without parole. Since then, the number of states that ban death-in-prison sentences for children has more than tripled, from five to seventeen. An additional 4 states and the District of Columbia ban the sentence for children in nearly all cases.

In just a few years, the CFSY has built a robust national alliance working to ban life-without-parole sentences for children. Our partners include conservative and liberal policymakers alike, faith leaders from every major world religion, medical professionals, defense attorneys, prosecutors, judges, and child advocates. We provide strategic research, assistance, and support to policymakers, advocates, and attorneys to end the practice of sentencing our children to die in prison.

As a result, the United States is on course to replace life-without-parole sentences for children with less punitive more age-appropriate accountability measures, informed by individuals and communities directly impacted by youth violence.

I invite you to join this growing movement of giving hope of a second chance to all children in our country.

"In many aspects of our culture and society we recognize the recklessness and impulsivity in children, which is why we don't allow them to make adult-decisions relating to voting, buying alcohol or tobacco products, entering into contracts, marrying, or joining the military. HB 2116 creates parity in our laws by recognizing that children are different from adults when it comes to criminal sentencing and that they should not be subject to our state's toughest penalties.

CELEBRATING FIVE YEARS OF POSITIVE SENTENCING REFORM FOR CHILDREN

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

In just five years—from 2011 to 2016—the number of states that ban death-in-prison sentences for children has more than tripled. In 2011, only five states did not permit children to be sentenced to life without parole. Remarkably, between 2013 and 2016, three states per year have eliminated lifewithout-parole as a sentencing option for children. The number of states that ban this extreme penalty grew from five states in 2011 to seventeen states in 2016.

This rapid rate of change, with twelve states prohibiting the penalty in the last four years alone, represents a dramatic policy shift, and it has been propelled in part by a growing understanding of children's unique capacity for positive change. Several decades of scientific research into the juvenile brain and behavioral development have explained what every parent and grandparent already knows—that children's neurological and decision-making capacity is not the same as adults.<sup>2</sup> Adolescents have a neurological proclivity for risk-taking, making them more susceptible to peer-pressure, and contributing to their failure to appreciate long-term consequences.<sup>3</sup> At the same time, these developmental deficiencies mean that children's personalities are not as fixed as adults, making them predisposed to maturation and rehabilitation.<sup>4</sup> In other words, children can and do change. In fact, research has found that most children grow out of their criminal behaviors by the time they reach adulthood.

Drawing in part from the scientific research, as well as several recent U.S. Supreme Court cases that have found that life without parole sentences violate the U.S. Constitution for the overwhelming majority of children,<sup>5</sup> there is growing momentum across state legislatures to reform criminal sentencing laws to prohibit children from being sentenced to life without parole and to ensure that children are given a meaningful opportunity to be released based on demonstrated growth and positive change. This momentum has also been fueled by the examples set by individuals who were once convicted of serious crimes as children. It has been through their actions and advocacy that they have demonstrated that every child is capable of change and are deserving of a second chance.

In addition to the rapid rate of change, legislation banning life without parole for children is notable for the geographic, political, and cultural diversity of states passing these reforms, the bipartisan nature in which bills have passed, and the overwhelming support within state legislatures.

Currently, Nevada, Utah, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, South Dakota, Kansas, Kentucky, Iowa, Texas, West Virginia, Vermont, Alaska, Hawaii, Delaware, Connecticut, and Massachusetts all ban life without parole sentences for children. Additionally California, Florida, New York, New Jersey, and the District of Columbia ban life without parole for children in nearly all cases involving homicide offenses.

It is also important to note that three additional states, including Maine, New Mexico, and Rhode Island have never imposed a life without parole sentence on a child. And several other states have not imposed the sentence on a child in the last 5 years — another cause for celebration as states both in law and practice have increasingly moved away from life without parole sentences for children.

These maps detail the evolution of state laws banning life without parole for children across the United States from 2012 to 2016.

Broad Support for Reform

LEGISLATIVE MOMENTUM TOWARD AGE-APPROPRIATE ACCOUNTABILITY

REFORM IN EVERY REGION

Legislative reform has passed in every region in the country, including New England, the Mid-Atlantic, the South, the Midwest, the West, and the Pacific, such as the states of Vermont, West Virginia, Texas, South Dakota, Nevada, and Hawaii.

Legislation to prohibit life without parole for children has passed in states that historically have been Republican-led, including Utah and Wyoming, and states that historically have been Democratic-led, including Connecticut and Delaware.

BIPARTISAN SUPPORT FOR REFORM

Sentencing reform to end life-without-parole sentences for children has gained the support and cosponsorship of Republicans and Democrats, resulting in robust passage rates. In Delaware, Wyoming, Hawaii, West Virginia, and Utah legislation passed in one chamber unanimously, and in Nevada, legislation passed both chambers unanimously. In many states, legislation has passed with retroactive application.

HIGHLIGHTS OF REFORM

Several states have led the movement for age-appropriate accountability for children. In addition to banning life without parole for children, these states have enacted legislation that ensures all children receive an opportunity for review and the possibility of release. For example, laws enacted in Delaware, Wyoming, West Virginia, Hawaii, Connecticut, and Nevada have allowed hundreds of individuals who were sentenced to lengthy prison terms for crimes committed as children a chance to demonstrate how they have matured and changed. Central to these reforms is the importance of ensuring that individuals that are given a second chance to live in free society have the opportunity to lead a meaningful life where they can finish their education, establish a career, and start a family. As a result of this cultural and legal shift, individuals who were once told as children that they would die in prison have returned home and now are contributing members of their communities.

Model legislation has included:

- consideration of youth-related mitigating factors at the time of sentencing for all children in the adult criminal justice system;
- careful reviews for all children sentenced in adult court to determine whether, years later, individuals convicted of crimes as children continue to pose a threat to the community; and
- consideration of youth-specific factors by parole boards, as well as due process protections including access to legal representation and periodic review.

West Virginia and Nevada are geographically and politically diverse states which can serve as examples for other states to follow and are explored in more detail below.

HB 4210 (2014)

VOTE MARGIN

House: 89 yeas, 9 nays

Senate: 34 yeas, 0 nays

SENTENCING PROVISIONS

In 2014, West Virginia passed HB 4210 which, among other things, banned the use of life without parole as a sentencing option for children. On the "sentencing front-end," the bill also specified that anytime a child is being sentenced for a felony offense as an adult in criminal court, a judge must consider the following mitigating circumstances:

- (1) Age at the time of the offense;
- (2) Impetuosity;
- (3) Family and community environment;
- (4) Ability to appreciate the risks and consequences of the conduct;
- (5) Intellectual capacity;
- (6) The outcomes of a comprehensive mental health evaluation conducted by an mental health professional licensed to treat adolescents in the State of West Virginia;
- (7) Peer or familial pressure;
- (8) Level of participation in the offense;
- (9) Ability to participate meaningfully in his or her defense;
- (10) Capacity for rehabilitation;
- (11) School records and special education evaluations;
- (12) Trauma history;
- (13) Faith and community involvement;
- (14) Involvement in the child welfare system; and
- (15) Any other mitigating factor or circumstances.

"We all fall short at times, and as a person of faith, I believe we all can be redeemed, particularly our children. Young people, often exposed to violence, poverty and neglect in home environments they cannot escape, sometimes make tragic mistakes. We should and can still hold them accountable for the harm they have caused but in an ageappropriate way that motivates them to learn from their mistakes and work toward the possibility of release. As minority chair on the Judiciary Committee, I can report that we passed this bill with widespread bipartisan support. I hope it will serve as a model for other state legislatures."

Former Delegate John Ellem (R)

REVIEW PROVISIONS

West Virginia established parole eligibility for all children convicted of any offense or offenses after no more than 15 years. Additionally, the parole board is required to take into consideration "the diminished culpability of juveniles as compared to that of adults, the hallmark features of youth, and any subsequent growth and increased maturity of the prisoner during incarceration." The parole board also must consider the following when determining whether or not to grant parole to an individual who was a child at the time of their offense(s):

- (1) A review of educational and court documents;
- (2) Participation in available rehabilitative and educational programs while in prison;
- (3) Age at the time of the offense;
- (4) Immaturity at the time of the offense;
- (5) Home and community environment at the time of the offense;
- (6) Efforts made toward rehabilitation;
- (7) Evidence of remorse; and
- (8) Any other factors or circumstances the board considers relevant.

Under existing law, individuals who are eligible for parole in West Virginia must be reviewed no later than every 3 years. This, coupled with the provisions outlined in HB 4210, make West Virginia's laws one of the national models that states should seek to imitate when holding children accountable for committing serious crimes.

Nevada

AB 267 (2015)

VOTE MARGIN

Assembly: 42 yeas, 0 nays

SENTENCING PROVISIONS

In 2015 Nevada unanimously passed AB 267 with the support of the Nevada District Attorneys Association. The new law bans the use of life without parole sentences for children and requires judges to consider "the differences between juvenile and adult offenders, including, without limitation, the diminished culpability of juveniles as compared to that of adults and the typical characteristics of youth" any time a child under the age of 18 is being sentenced as an adult in criminal court.

REVIEW PROVISIONS

AB 267 also specifies parole eligibility guidelines for individuals who committed their crimes under the age of 18, as follows:

- (a) For a prisoner who is serving a period of incarceration for having been convicted of an offense or offenses that did not result in the death of a victim, after the prisoner has served 15 calendar years of incarceration, including any time served in a county jail.
- (b) For a prisoner who is serving a period of incarceration for having been convicted of an offense or offenses that resulted in the death of only one victim, after the prisoner has served 20 calendar years of incarceration, including any time served in a county jail.

As a result of AB 267, nearly every child who had been given a sentence that would have made them ineligible for release on parole for more than 20 years will now be eligible for parole after either 15 or 20 years. More than 100 people serving life or other life-equivalent sentences were directly impacted by the passage of this law.

"When we sentence a child to die in prison, we forestall the possibility that he or she can change and find redemption. In doing so, we ignore Jesus' fundamental teachings of love, mercy, and forgiveness."

Nevada Assembly Speaker John Hambrick (R)

A Conservative Perspective

BY NEVADA ASSEMBLY SPEAKER JOHN HAMBRICK (R) AND FORMER WEST VIRGINIA DELEGATE JOHN ELLEM (R)

It is time to ban life-without-parole sentences for children.

As conservative Republican legislators, we helped lead the efforts in our states to end these sentences and replace them with age-appropriate sentences that consider children's capacity to change and become rehabilitated. In West Virginia and Nevada, the states we represent, the legislatures overwhelmingly passed these measures.

The impact of serious crimes is no less tragic because a child is involved and youth must be held accountable for their conduct. However, as a modern society we must balance protecting public safety and justice for victims with the psychological and developmental differences between children and adults. In fact, many victims' families, who have come to know the child offenders in their cases, have found healing when the child was given the possibility of a second chance. Not everyone should be released from prison, but those children who change and become rehabilitated should be given that hope, and we should support healing for the victims' families and their communities.

Adolescent development research has shown children do not possess the same capacity as adults to think through the consequences of their behaviors, control their responses, or avoid peer pressure. Often times the children who commit serious offenses have suffered abuse, neglect and trauma, which affects their development and plays a role in their involvement in the justice system. Drawing in part on this research, the U.S. Supreme Court has said children are "constitutionally different" and should not be subject to our harshest penalties.

But our motivation goes beyond what the Court said. Redemption is a basic tenet of nearly every religion. When we sentence a child to die in prison, we forestall the possibility that he or she can change and find redemption. In doing so, we ignore Jesus' fundamental teachings of love, mercy, and forgiveness. As Father Bernard Healey recently pointed out - Moses, David, and the Apostle Paul were all guilty of killing, but found redemption and purpose through the grace of God. Shouldn't we show this same mercy to our nation's children, allowing them a chance at redemption?

Seventeen states have banned life-without-parole sentences for children. The time has come for all states to do so. As Congress looks to criminal justice reform, they would do well to make banning these sentences a priority.

Prosecutors for Reform

PROTECTING PUBLIC SAFETY AND PROMOTING AGE-APPROPRIATE ACCOUNTABILITY

Many policymakers and prosecutors around the country are drawing the conclusion that life-without-parole sentences for children are morally wrong and not in keeping with the American values we all hold so dear. Philadelphia District Attorney, Seth Williams, recently remarked that he will no longer seek the punishment of life without parole for children – a significant departure for a city which previously had the

"I am proud of our legislators for acknowledging that the minds of children are different from those of adults in very specific ways. Certainly, when children commit serious crimes, we in law enforcement must respond and protect the community; however, putting a child in prison and throwing away the key is not a humane or cost-effective solution to this problem."

Kauai County Prosecuting Attorney Justin Kollar

largest number of juvenile lifers in the nation. Williams' position follows a growing trend among prosecutors across the United States who are abandoning the practice of sentencing children to die in prison and supporting lawmakers as they make this shift.<sup>6</sup>

Indeed, over the last five years, several prosecutors have been actively engaged in legislative efforts to ban life without parole sentences for children. Some have even provided testimony in support of these legislatives changes, like Kauai Prosecuting Attorney Justin Kollar, who supported the 2014 law that banned life without parole for children in Hawaii.

Through the passage of these reforms, many states have demonstrated that we can both protect public safety while also recognizing that most children who commit serious crimes can and do change. While children must be held accountable for the crimes they commit, no child deserves to be sentenced to die in prison without any hope of release.

A Prosecutor's Perspective

BY SALT LAKE COUNTY DISTRICT ATTORNEY SIM GILL

For the fourth time in just over ten years, the U.S. Supreme Court has weighed in on the constitutional sentencing parameters for juveniles who commit serious violent offenses. These four cases represent a major paradigm shift in how the state can and will pursue just outcomes in cases involving juveniles who commit serious crimes.

"I supported the legislative effort in Utah because I believe our law must demand accountability and rehabilitation from juveniles who commit terrible crimes. Public safety will be served best when the law empowers parole boards (or judges in states without a parole system) to make release determinations based on a juvenile offender's actual—rather than future hypothetical—maturation and rehabilitation."

Sim Gill, Salt Lake County District Attorney

In Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005), the Court said that sentencing a juvenile to death violates the Eighth Amendment. In Graham v. Florida, 560 U.S. 48 (2010), the Court said that sentencing a juvenile to life without parole for a nonhomicide offense—even a serious, violent nonhomicide—violates the Eighth Amendment. In Miller v. Alabama, 132 S.Ct. 2455 (2012), the Court said that a mandatory life without parole sentence imposed on a juvenile for a homicide offense violates the Eighth Amendment, because the sentencer must take into account the unique factors of youth before sentencing a juvenile to life in prison. And on January 25, 2016 in Montgomery v. Louisiana, 136 S.Ct. 718 (2016), the Court said that the Miller decision applies retroactively and that life without parole is unconstitutional for the vast majority of juveniles who commit homicide. In its 2016 General Session, the Utah Legislature overwhelmingly passed H.B. 405, which eliminated life without the possibility of parole in cases where the offender was under the age of 18 at the time of the offense and where the offender is sentenced after May 10, 2016. I supported that bill because it was based on sound policy.

Juveniles and adults are treated differently under the law in the United States in any number of ways: juveniles can't vote, serve in the military, buy cigarettes or alcohol, or enter into contracts. And now the Supreme Court has made clear that juveniles and adults must be treated differently for sentencing purposes as well, at least as regards the use of extreme sentences, like the death penalty and life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. It's worth noting that with the exception of Graham (which involved an armed burglary with assault or battery), all of these cases involved juveniles convicted of serious homicide offenses. So when the Court assessed the constitutional uniqueness of juveniles at sentencing, the Court did so in the context of some of the most violent and terrible crimes that come through our courts.

In Roper, Graham, Miller, and Montgomery, the Supreme Court looked to the underlying research for why juveniles and adults are treated differently under the law—namely, that juveniles are physiologically impulsive, impressionable, and engage in risky behavior, but that given time, juveniles can outgrow antisocial adolescent behavior. According to the Court, brain science shows that "ordinary adolescent development diminishes the likelihood that a juvenile offender [who commits a serious homicide] forever will be a danger to society." Montgomery, 136 S.Ct. at 733. The Court also emphasized that the "relevance of youth as a mitigating factor derives from the fact that the signature qualities of youth are transient; as individuals mature, the impetuousness and recklessness that may dominate in younger years can subside. . . . For most teens, risky or antisocial behaviors are fleeting; they cease with maturity as individual identity becomes settled." Roper, 543 U.S. at 570.

The constitutional uniqueness of juveniles for sentencing purposes highlights new and challenging responsibilities for prosecutors, and Miller and Montgomery in particular have created a complex landscape for prosecutors to navigate. Whereas Roper and Graham instituted a categorical bar on a particular punishment, Miller did not. However, Montgomery clarified that "Miller did bar life without parole . . . for all but the rarest of juvenile offenders, those whose crimes reflect permanent incorrigibility. . . . Before Miller, every juvenile convicted of a homicide offense could be sentenced to life without parole. After Miller, it will be the rare juvenile offender who can receive that same sentence. The only difference between Roper and Graham, on the one hand, and Miller, on the other hand, is that Miller drew a line between children whose crimes reflect transient immaturity and those rare children whose crimes reflect irreparable corruption. The fact that life without parole could be a proportionate sentence for the latter kind of juvenile offender does not mean that all other children imprisoned under a disproportionate sentence have not suffered the deprivation of a substantive right." Montgomery, 136 S. Ct. at 734.

The state must uphold the laws and Constitution on behalf of all its citizenry—and that includes criminal defendants. Following Roper, the state no longer pursued death for juveniles who committed homicide. Doing so would have undermined the very law we as prosecutors strive to uphold. The same is now true for pursuing life without parole for juveniles. To seek life without parole in the vast majority of cases in which we are statutorily permitted is not justice under the Constitution.

In jurisdictions where life without the possibility of parole is still a sentencing option for juvenile offenders, Miller and Montgomery present significant practical challenges for prosecutors in addition to ethical ones. Not only must prosecutors divine which crimes reflect irreparable corruption and which do not, the burden now rests on the state to prove irreparable corruption in order to secure a constitutional life-without-parole sentence. This is a high, if not impossible, burden to meet, given what we know about juveniles' biological capacity for positive change.

Therefore, instead of wasting resources prosecuting the thorny issue of which juveniles who commit homicide are irreparably corrupt and which are not, prosecutors should come out in support of ending the practice of life without parole for juveniles altogether. I supported the legislative effort in Utah because I believe our law must demand accountability and rehabilitation from juveniles who commit terrible crimes. Public safety will be served best when the law empowers parole boards (or judges in states without a parole system) to make release determinations based on a juvenile offender's actual—rather than future hypothetical—maturation and rehabilitation. As prosecutors, it is our responsibility to uphold the Constitution and to seek just outcomes. It is time for us to seek just and age-appropriate outcomes for the juveniles we prosecute.

Children Change

INCARCERATED CHILDREN'S ADVOCACY NETWORK (ICAN)

As an initiative of the Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth, the Incarcerated Children's Advocacy Network or ICAN, is a national network of leaders who were formerly incarcerated as youth and who are living proof of the unique capacity for change that resides within every child. Members humbly recognize their responsibility to humanity and serve as a source of motivation to others that it is never too late to become a positive force in the community. Every ICAN member was previously convicted or pled guilty to a homicide-related offense and/or was sentenced to life without parole for a crime committed as a child. ICAN members champion the cause for age-appropriate and trauma-informed alternatives to the extreme sentencing of America's youth. ICAN changes the narrative around children convicted of serious crimes by educating members of the public, including policymakers, about the childhood trauma and adverse circumstances that most children who commit serious crimes contend with, and most importantly, about the capacity for every child to change and become more than the worst thing they've ever done. It is through these efforts and serving as positive role models for other at-risk youth in their communities, that members of ICAN live out, what they call their "eternal apology" to society.

ICAN has played a central role in advocating for, and informing recent youth sentencing policy reforms. Featured below are profiles of current ICAN members who are living examples that every child is more than the worst thing they've ever done and that if given the opportunity children who commit serious crimes not only change, but go on to greatly contribute to their communities and our country:

At the age of 13 Xavier McElrath-Bey was sent to prison for murder, but through faith and maturation turned his life around. While he was incarcerated, Xavier earned both his Associates and Bachelor's degrees. Upon his release he started off as a Starbucks Barista, earned a Master's Degree, and worked in various youth intervention and juvenile justice research positions. He currently serves as Youth Justice Advocate at the CFSY and is the founding member of ICAN. He lives with his partner and their daughter Sophia in Chicago, Illinois.

Dolphy Jordan's early life was challenging. He was born in San Diego, and grew up in Seattle in an impoverished and abusive home environment. His father was addicted to drugs, and Dolphy's mother relied on welfare to raise him and his sister.

By the time he was in the 9th grade, Dolphy had attended 15 or 16 different schools. He acted out, and was kicked out of some schools for truancy and bad behavior. At one point, his mom also kicked him out of the house. For a while, Dolphy bounced between the streets and various foster homes.

At the age of 16 Dolphy Jordan was convicted of murder in Washington State. After serving 21 years he was given a second chance. Upon release he enrolled in college and graduated with honors earning the Presidential award at commencement. Currently he works full time with King County Drug Diversion Court as a Resource Specialist connecting people dealing with substance use disorders and mental health issues to community resources. He also works with another nonprofit and talks with youth at truancy workshops.

He is very active in the community, loves the outdoors, and is an avid Seahawks fan.

In His Own Words: "Through my experiences I have learned to truly appreciate the value of life and know that people have the capacity to change despite whatever circumstances they may face."

Sean Ahshee Taylor's formative years in Denver were filled with challenges: His mom battled crack addiction, and his father, who was not a major presence in his life, was incarcerated in prison.

When he was about 14, Sean joined the Bloods street gang. To adolescent Sean, the gang offered the potential of financial stability. In 1990, at the age of 17, a jury convicted Sean of first-degree homicide.

While in prison, Sean began reading numerous books, and eventually taught fellow incarcerated people adult basic education. Sean, who speaks some Spanish, also taught ESL (English as a Second Language) courses. In 2011, a juvenile-clemency board created by Colorado Gov. Bill Ritter (D) granted clemency to Sean and three other people who were minors at the time of their crimes. Sean was released at age 38.

Shortly after he gained his freedom, Sean was hired as a case worker by the Second Chance Center, in Aurora. The center aspires to reduce the recidivism rates of men and women who have been incarcerated by helping them transition into successful lives in society. Sean is a role model for the people he works with. Since he started working at the Center, he has worked his way up and is now the organization's deputy director. He is also a gang intervention specialist.

In His Own Words: "Those of us who are formerly incarcerated are role modelling possibilities. The ones we left behind are saying, if we can get out and be successful so can they. That's priceless seed planting."

Francesca Duran learned from her abusive, alcoholic mother to respond to problems not with dialogue, but with violence.

At 13, during a fight with several other teenagers, Francesca's cousin pulled a knife and stabbed one of the girls, killing her. New Mexico authorities charged Francesca with accessory to commit first-degree murder, conspiracy, and harboring a felon.

At 16, Francesca eventually pled to lesser charges, including battery resulting in great bodily harm, and was sentenced to two years in juvenile detention. She gave birth to her son, Joedamien, while incarcerated. Francesca's mother, who had received treatment for alcoholism, took care of the baby while Francesca served her time. She was released in 2003, when the boy was a year old.

In 2006, Francesca began work at PB & J Family services, which provides social services to families in the Albuquerque area. Francesca started as a home visitor, conducting home visits to ensure that children were in healthy environments. She worked her way up, and today supervises six workers in that unit.

In Her Own Words: "All families matter, all parents are human beings who deserve respect, people are greater than their circumstances, people can change. It's strong leaders like ICAN and CSFY that exemplify these values."

At the age of 16 Ellis Curry was convicted of murder in Florida. He is currently an entrepreneur and small business owner in Jacksonville and volunteers with Compassionate Families where he travels around the state with the father of the victim in his case, Glen Mitchell, talking to at-risk youth about the perils of bad choices. He is also a loving husband.

In His Own Words: "I believe that every child should get a second chance because if you would have met me at the age of 16 you would have thought I was a monster but now I'm a business owner and a law-abiding citizen."

At the age of 17 Eric Alexander was sent to prison for Aggravated Robbery and Murder in Tennessee. Since his release he has a become a mentor to other at-risk youth and currently serves as the Program Director for the YMCA Community Project in Nashville, Tennessee. He is happily married and recently became a father to a baby girl. He and his wife have also adopted a teenage boy.

In His Own Words: "There is not a greater gift than to be given a second chance and then use that opportunity to give back to youth who are in desperate need of someone who they can relate to while helping them to navigate through brokenness."

A New Hope

CONTINUED REFORM ON THE HORIZON

As a nation of second chances it is imperative that we remember that mercy is justice too and that children, more than anyone else, deserve our mercy. We applaud and celebrate the diverse states that have banned life without parole sentences for children over the last 5 years. In particular, we celebrate the political and moral courage of the policymakers across our country who have demonstrated true leadership in uniformly and soundly rejecting the human rights abuse of sentencing children to die in prison.

While the 2016 legislative sessions have come to a close in most states, several additional bills to abolish life-without-parole sentences for children are currently pending around the country. Given the rapid rate of positive reform in the past five years, we look forward to more states joining our growing movement in the coming years.

STORIES OF HOPE & TESTIMONIALS OF CFSY'S WORK

Assembly Speaker John Hambrick (R) Watches as Governor Sandoval (R) Signs AB 267 into Law

"The work that the Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth is doing is changing the lives, the hopes and aspirations of men, women and families across America. I have witnessed first-hand how families rejoice and celebrate when their loved ones have benefited from their work."

-Assembly Speaker John Hambrick (R)

"I wish there was something I could say that would adequately express how grateful I am, but there simply are no words to describe the feeling that comes from breathing fresh air as a free man or hugging your aunt in your grandmother's kitchen. I grew up in prison, I spent 31 years incarcerated to be exact, and I still cannot believe you [CFSY] have made it possible for me to have kids, get married, and help others. We cannot stop until every child sentenced to life without has the chance to one day sit in their grandmother's kitchen and hear their aunt say, "I love you.""

Christopher Williams, pictured with his sister LeAnna Williams, was given hope of a second chance because of AB 267

"AB 267 has enabled me to truly see hope; hope in what was an impossibly hopeless set of circumstances that I had realized as my life; hope that even though I spent 3 years on Death Row and the last 20 years serving life without parole, that all was not lost, as I now have the hope of a future life outside of prison."

-Christopher Williams

"Instead of counting days he is there, now we are counting days till his next Parole Hearing. I want to thank everyone at the Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth, Speaker John Hambrick, and everyone involved with AB 267 not only for changing the future of Christopher's life, but for also changing the quality of my own life as well. I will be forever grateful."

-LeAnna Williams

"AB 267 is a big deal. Never did I expect to see a Parole Board, let alone anticipate the full scale of what being in the "free world" means. This bill has allowed many incarcerated persons to have an opportunity to be heard by the Parole Board, a feat that was never to be accomplished by those of us who had Juvenile Life Without the Possibility of Parole, such as myself. All of my adult life has been in prison, until about a month and a half ago. Now, I have a job, I am learning to drive a car, and I can choose what I would like to eat for my meals. These things are taken for granted by John Q. Public, but to be without them is no way to exist."

-Jon Hawkins

"In one fell swoop, this piece of legislation literally saved so many men and women and gave them new life. I have been proud to be a part of it and honored to watch as these individuals who lived without hope in the law, but filled with hope in their hearts, get released and become contributing members of society. Working with the professionals at the Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth has been a great experience. They are always available and ready to step into any state at any time to help get the necessary legislation passed. The professionalism, experience and knowledge they offer navigating the legislative system is invaluable and impressive."

"The Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth provided important testimony and support. As important as the sentencing reform is, I think it is equally valuable that legislators had the opportunity to think differently about how and why we incarcerate children."

"Working with the Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth to pass legislation to ban life without parole sentences for children in Vermont was so very helpful. Their knowledge, availability and rapport with legislators made all the difference. I can honestly say that without CFSY's help, this never would have happened."

-Vermont State Representative Barbara Rachelson (D)

"Invaluable' and 'heaven sent' are words that come to mind when I think about the tremendous blessing the Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth has been in my life. What better description is there for a people who pick up the shovel to uncover children who have been buried alive?"

Dr. Linda White, whose daughter Cathy was murdered by two teenagers, has been a strong advocate for ending life without parole sentences for children.

"I'm incredibly grateful to CFSY for all the work they've done to change the dialogue regarding youthful offenders. In spite of being the mother of a young woman who was killed by two 15-year-olds, I see only waste - wasted lives and wasted funds better spent on prevention - in keeping children locked up until they die behind bars. It also seems really cruel to their families who become one more set of victims."

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES

We believe that young people convicted of serious crimes should be held accountable for the harm they have caused in a way that reflects their capacity to grow and change. We believe in fair sentencing for youth that reflects our human rights, values and moral beliefs, and as such, the fundamental difference between youth and adults. Research has proven that youth are still developing both physically and emotionally and their brains, not just their bodies, are not yet fully mature. Because of these differences, youth have greater potential to become rehabilitated. Therefore, we believe that youth under the age of 18 should never be sentenced to prison for the rest of their lives without hope of release.

We believe that a just alternative to life in prison without parole is to provide careful reviews to determine whether, years later, individuals convicted of crimes as youth continue to pose a threat to the community. There would be no guarantee of release—only the opportunity to demonstrate that they are capable of making responsible decisions and do not pose a threat to society. This alternative to life without parole sentencing appropriately reflects the harm that has been done, as well as the special needs and rights of youth, and focuses on rehabilitation and reintegration into society.

We know that victims and survivors of serious crimes committed by youth endure significant hardship and trauma. They deserve to be provided with supportive services, and should be notified about sentencing reviews related to their cases. We believe in restorative practices that promote healing for the crime victims as well as the young people who have been convicted of crimes.

Sentencing minors to life terms sends an unequivocal message to young people that they are beyond redemption. We believe that society should not be in the practice of discarding young people convicted of crimes for life, but instead, should provide motivations and opportunities for healing, rehabilitation, and the potential for them to one day return to our communities as productive members of society.
